

As a staunch advocate for individual liberty and limited government intervention, I wholeheartedly support HB396, which exempts in-state meat and meat food products from certain inspections when sold within New Hampshire. This bill empowers local producers and consumers by reducing unnecessary regulatory burdens that stifle small businesses and limit consumer choice. By allowing individuals to freely engage in commerce without excessive oversight, HB396 upholds the principles of personal responsibility and free market competition. Consumers, who are fully capable of making informed decisions, can choose to support local farmers and businesses without the heavy hand of government dictating terms. This bill not only fosters economic freedom but also strengthens community ties by encouraging local trade. HB396 is a win for individual liberty, local economies, and the right of New Hampshire residents to conduct their affairs as they see fit.

Drew McCalmont
Hollis